Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: .on a subject which has received but little attention and which is of vital importance; after giving most interesting information and valuable tables, the author concludes as follows; All the presumption is in favor of the married as against the single. The family is an added incentive for him to keep up his insurance. The conservatism of the family man, together with the higher rates of advancing years, combine to lead him to persist. The single man, on the other hand, having only him-self to care for, either takes out an endowment policy for his own benefit, or he is very liable to allow his policy to lapse when stress of circumstances tempts him. From the regulation made by the different companies, it will be seen that the line is drawn, not at marriage per se, but at some of the conditions which accompany it. Only...
