Excerpt: .with the work of the regular health official, but an aid in this work. While, then, a court may not generally interfere with the diagnosis of an official veterinarian, it might very properly set aside a diagnosis which was evidently not made in accord with the present state of scientific knowledge. The cause of glanders is the Bacillus mallei, which is well known. It is not unlikely that where a veterinarian has neglected to verify his diagnosis by means of a bacterial examination or blood test the court might properly question his diagnosis. If, therefore, the veterinarian orders a horse killed for that disease he should make and preserve microscopic slides showing the Bacillus mallei taken from that horse, and each slide should be so marked as to be proper evidence to present in trial of possible future action in the case. In such cases the court would not be reviewing the diagnosis, but it might set the diagnosis aside as a violation of discretion, in that the veterinarian had not made use of approved methods of diagnosis. 8 Kennedy v.
